This study evaluated the quality of medical records in a multidisciplinary unit. The study used as indicators the completeness of records, the accuracy of records, the interval between medical visits, and the number of relevant clinical exams. We compared how the quality of records was before and after the implementation of clinical information system (CIS) and determined the barriers to the adoption of CIS. Results were considered satisfactory if the compliance rate for the quality indicators was equal to or greater than 90%. Before the implementation of CIS, only 6% of the medical records satisfied the criteria for completeness, and only 55% the criteria for accuracy. The accuracy rate and the interval between visits were similar in both groups. After the implementation of CIS, the mean completeness increased

(94.9%), and the accuracy (92.7%) and the interval between visits (95.1%) improved. The use of a CIS and a clinical workflow process with systematic data collection and reporting facilitates the flow of clinical information, makes it more complete and accurate, and improves the interval between visits.
